Lamar and Judge Par-dee, refusing to allow the Farmers' Loan and Trust Company of New York an appeal from the decree rendered in the case in April, 1887, fore-closing the lien on the Texas Central Railway property and ordering the sale of it to pay the bonded indebted-ness. This leaves the case now only to be passed upon by the Supreme Court of the United States as to whether or not the decree entered will be affirmed and the sale made, or reversed and a new trial ordered.

First-Class.

The grocery store of W. S. Head, Austin street, is one of the largest and best in the city. The leading feature of the store is the sale of only first-class goods, and one hazards nothing in saying that an adulterated article is not to be found in the establishment. For fastidious persons, who look closely to the quality of the food they eat as a means of preserving health, this grocery store is to be commended, while it abounds in the finer delicacies for invalids and people of cultured tastes. The stock is a very large and varied one, and prices are very reasonable, and the News has the greatest pleasure in commending this house to the consideration of its readers, a large number of whom are already customers there.

Sueing for a Divorce from a Negro.

Chicago, Ill., Aug. 31.—Pretty 19-year-old Ida McGrath tells a remarkable story in the bill she files before the Circuit Court, asking that her marriage with a coal black negro be annulled. The girl says that her father died when she was 12 years old, leaving beside herself a widow and four other daughters without any means save such as they were able to obtain by their individual industry. Since her infancy Ida was of weak mind and easily subjected to the will or wish of any person. After her father's death her mother and the five daughters removed to Detroit. While there in October, 1884, Henry Watkins, a negro, 35 years old, abducted her from her home, and by threats induced her to marry him. She was but 14 years old and incapacitated by mental infirmity. In making a vigorous objection, she says that as soon as she could so she escaped from him and returned to her people. A month later they came to Chicago, and from November, 1884, until April 23, 1888, she did not live with Watkins. During all that time, however, he persistently attempted to induce her to abandon her home and live with him, and by threats and promises sought to induce her to recognize him as her husband. Finally becoming satisfied that he could not move her, Ida says that on April 23 last, Watkins, by threatening to take her life compelled her to consent to another marriage, which was solemnized in Chicago. Every since then, up to a few days ago, she has lived with him as his wife. Until April 23 she never informed her parents of her first marriage, being restrained from so doing by his threats of death. Miss McGrath says that, not having any means, she was never able until now to secure the protection of the law, which she now does by asking an annulment of the marriage relations for duress and fraud. She says that during all the time she has lived with Watkins since April 23 he has not provided her with raiment or food. She said he threatened that if she sued him for a divorce he would kill her, and she fears unless he is restrained he will do so. Her lawyer went before Judge Moran and secured an injunction restraining Watkins from interfering with the girl.
